

THE ORBITARIUM

A field guide to the worlds hiding inside a spreadsheet.

There are two kinds of archive: one that remembers the addresses, and another that helps a visitor discover why the addresses matter.

IDEA BRIDGES

A snapshot, not a prediction. 26 October 2026. All counts refer to the source atlas and its recorded HTTP audit.

Not a directory. An instrument.

A spreadsheet can track the state of the universe. An interface can let someone experience its connections. Keeping these two layers separate is the whole trick.

01

A reachable URL

Evidence that a server responded. Not evidence of a usable page.

02

A legible world

A title, a purpose, a theme and a reason to visit.

03

A bridge

An editorial hypothesis connecting ideas. The reasons stay visible.

04

A journey

A purposeful sequence, with questions and room to disagree.

THE EVIDENCE CONTRACT

196 of 436 collected URLs were reported working by the source sheet. The public app displays 195 after excluding the private HQ. Connections are conceptual associations, not discovered hyperlinks. Real-browser quality and current uptime remain unverified.

Four exercises for a curious mind.

No productivity challenge. No algorithmically mandated self-optimisation. Just ways to put connections under honest pressure.

01 / CROSS A BORDER

Pick two worlds from different themes. Write one connection and one important difference.

02 / REFUSE THE RANK

Visit two projects without deciding which is better. Ask what different human needs each serves.

03 / FOLLOW A FAILURE

Open the Signal Room. Distinguish a broken crawler endpoint from a broken public experience.

04 / LEAVE A TRAIL

Write a four-stop path for someone who knows nothing about your subject. Give each stop a question.

AFTER THE PORTAL

Keep the map honest.

The most useful next version is not automatically larger. It is clearer about evidence, more discoverable, and easier for someone else to maintain.
